

Policing Project at New York University School of Law Seeks Deputy Director

The Policing Project at NYU School of Law is seeking to hire another Deputy Director. This is a notable opportunity to join an organization that is doing cutting edge work, growing rapidly, and working on some of the most pressing issues of the day.

The mission of the Policing Project is to bring democratic accountability to policing. We work on projects across the country designed to bring the community's voice to policing practices and policies. We do this work in conjunction with communities and police agencies both. We write rules and best practices for policing agencies. We partner with social scientists on cost-benefit analysis of policing practices. And we participate in litigation with an aim of changing the way constitutional law governs policing, to provide more democratic accountability. Learn more about us on our website: www.policingproject.org

In advancing its mission, the Policing Project works closely with groups across the ideological spectrum. Its partners are policing agencies, other not-for-profits, community organizations, academic institutions, law firms, and governments. Our work takes us all over the country.

The job will involve project management, research and writing, working with our partners, supervising our student (and possibly other) workers, and helping move our many endeavors forward. This is an opportunity to take ownership of some very exciting and challenging projects.

This position requires a variety of skills, of which the following are essential:

- at least three years of professional experience in policing, government, law, or a related field;
- excellent research and writing ability;
- strong interpersonal skills (be it talking with a police chief, a line officer, a community organizer, an academic, or a mayor);
- good judgment, and the ability to keep many balls in the air without dropping them;
- willingness to travel.
